Part aggregator, part podcast, part Discord community, New Models is a Berlin-based media collective championing curation over algorithm-driven content. As they put it on newmodels.io: “In an online landscape where the present is the only time that exists, sometimes the old is the new that’s needed.” With this in mind, 032c invited them to look inside the black box of the 032c cultural laboratory on the occasion of our 20th anniversary year. New Models’ Caroline Busta and Lil Internet responded with questions, chronological notes, and a timeline, presented alongside 032c’s own archival selection of snapshots and quotes from readers – together occupying one side of a celebratory 28-page fold-out.

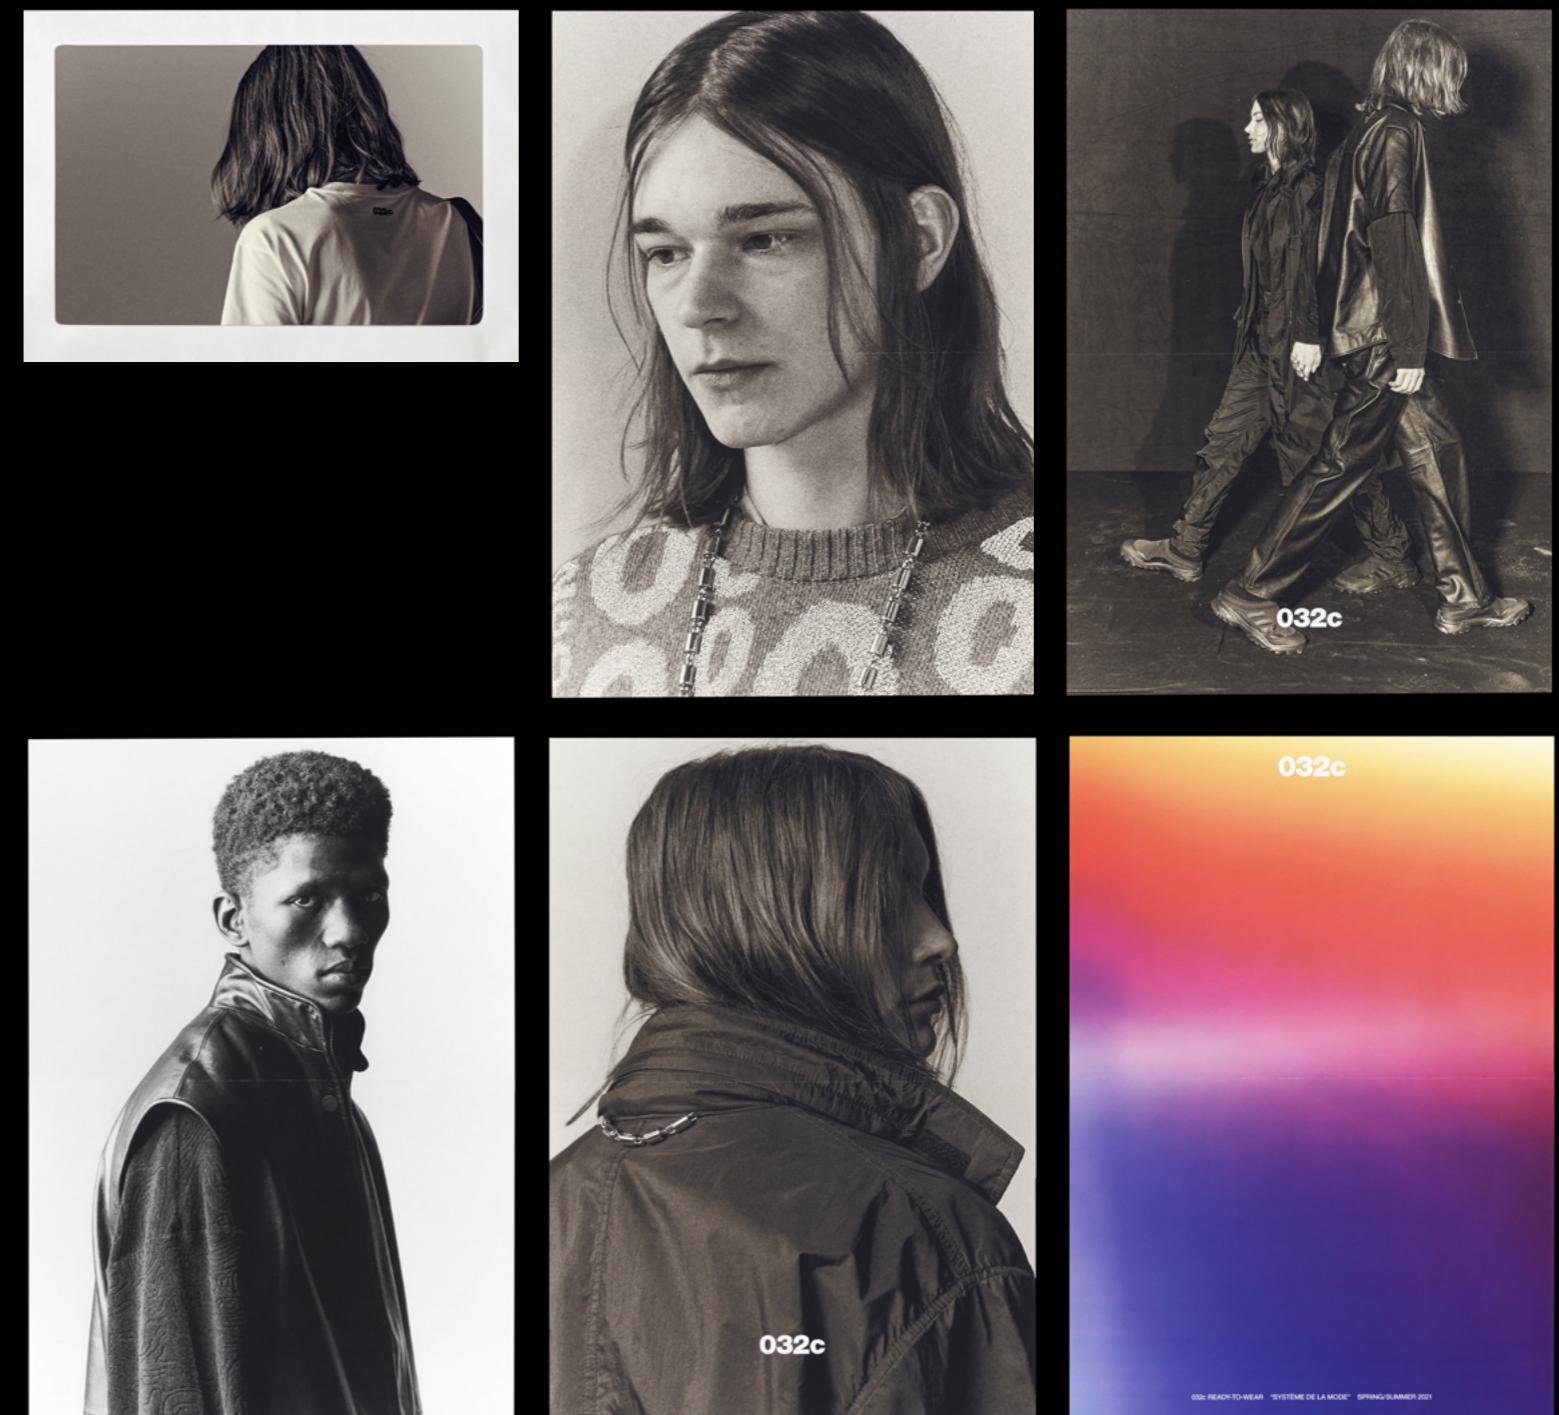

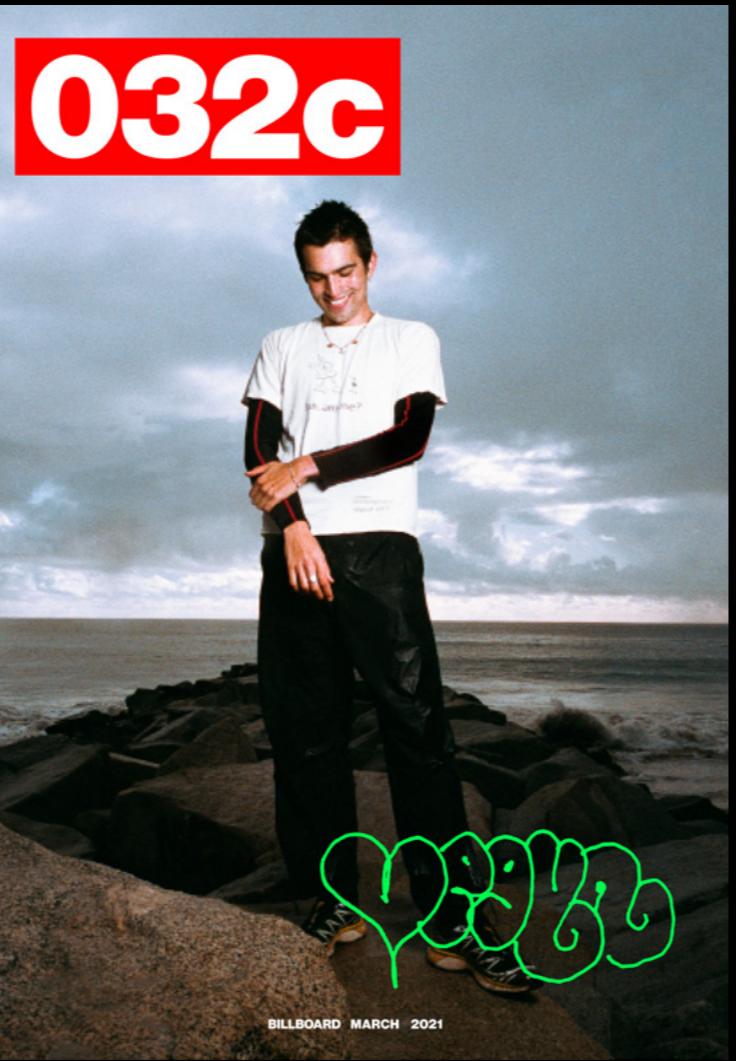

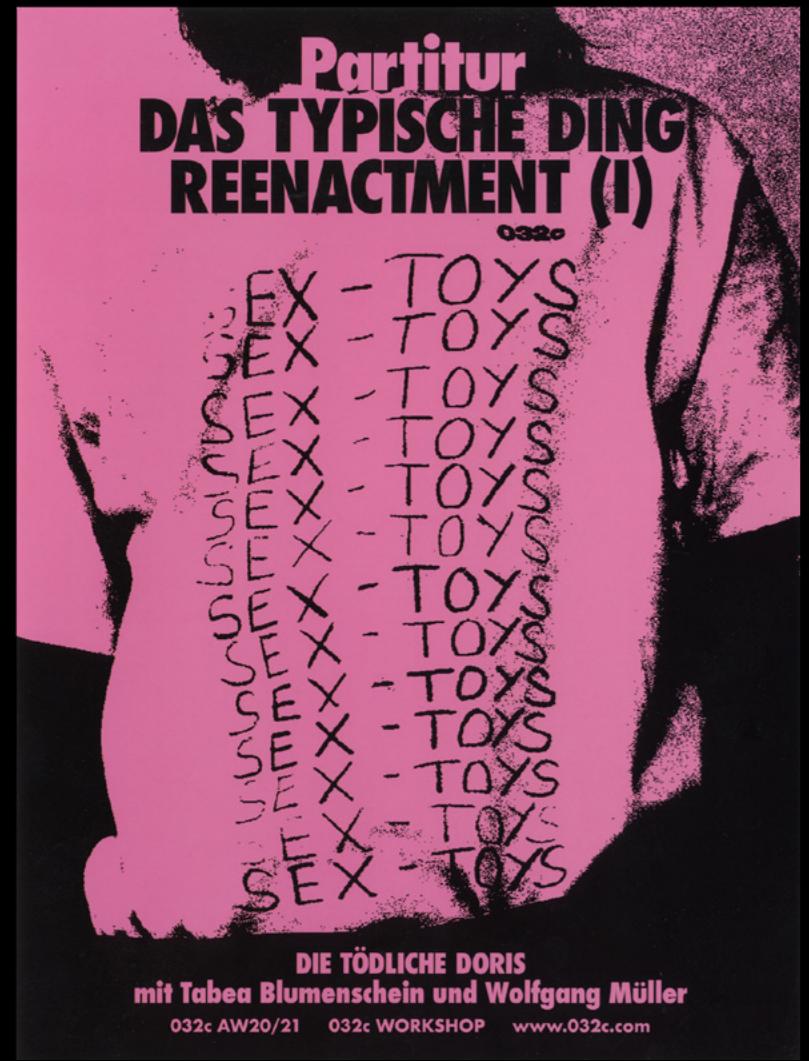

The other side features something different: a visual essay comprised of memorable images – some headliners, some sleeper cells – published in 032c since the very beginning. It is a showcase of our contributors and a retrospective look at how the pages of 032c magazine have both reflected and created the look of independent culture media in the first two decades 21st century.

Avec ce qui reste

“Avec ce qui reste”, French for “With what is left” is the publication ideated by Johanna Tagada Hoffbeck, overviewed by Thierry Chancogne, including a text by Elein Fleiss, printed in an educational space employing the Risograph technique, and hand-bound by Florence Aknin, Pauline Simonet, students and friends from Nevers, on the occasion of the exhibition with the same name at Ravisius Textor, Nevers (France).

“What is left” in times of a global pandemic, with its particularly virulent and dangerous variant in the country where Johanna resides, takes on peculiar meaning. Something dramatic unfolds against a background of ecological bankruptcy that Johanna nevertheless persists in dealing with by ways of gentleness and attention to things, to beings, to the living in all their forms. By collecting presences, movements, traces. By constructing fragile images and delicate installations as so many testimonies and persistence of the world.

For Abloh, the museum catalogue is another opportunity to “question everything.” This monograph explores his creative output in a three-books-in-one format. The catalogue section offers an overview of the artist’s interdisciplinary practice by Michael Darling and features essays and interviews with key voices in art, fashion, design, and architecture, including Taiye Selasi, Lou Stoppard, Michael Rock, Samir Bantal, Rem Koolhaas, and Anja Aronowsky Cronberg. In the archives section, more than 1,800 never-before-seen images pulled from the artist’s personal files reveal the remarkable breadth of Abloh’s influences and collaborations. The index cross references the catalogue plates with his projects and process, using a vocabulary of themes developed by Virgil Abloh. The binding also intentionally exposes the spine of the bound book and the raw boards used for the cover case.

West (and his inseparable deputy Abloh) and who would subsequently hire Abloh for the Louis Vuitton menswear job in 2018 after he had moved to that company.¹² Bracketing this period, starting in 2006 and extending through 2009, West got very close to launching his own fashion line called Pastelle, making numerous prototypes and involving a who's who of art and design talents, including Murakami, KAWS, Abloh, A Bathing Ape, Kim Jones, Don C, Ben Baller, and others.¹³ West abandoned this enterprise in the fall of 2009 after the extremely negative fallout from his interruption of Taylor Swift's acceptance speech at the Video Music Awards, and it never made it into the public realm.

West's travails in launching a bona fide fashion brand illustrate the old-fashioned hierarchies that held firm until very recently, but in the past few years, a tectonic shift has occurred, flipping the top-down model of big business and high fashion pushing their products to an eager young culture (fig. 5). Now, with Abloh as the most illustrative example of this shift, big businesses and fashion houses actually seek those untrained but culturally influential figures to bring energy, ideas, and cache to their brands. Gosha Rubchinskiy, Rihanna, and 2 Chainz are just a few who have followed in the wake of West's breakthroughs and exerted their ideas on fashion, opening up new channels for audiences and business opportunities. Abloh had a front-row seat to this sea change and learned every lesson he could from his mentor's successes and failures. In a radio interview rant that has since become legendary and commemorated as a meme, West summarized the frustrations and impossibilities of a young black man breaking through the firewall of high fashion.¹⁴ Becoming enraged at DJ Sway's naïveté that one can just go out and make clothes that change the culture, West enumerated the millions of dollars he lost trying to do just that and began yelling at his interviewer, "How Sway?! You don't have the answers!"

Abloh was determined not to suffer the same fate, and after more than ten years of dutifully servicing West and other Donda customers with his ideas, taste, and connoisseurship, he was ready to go out on his own. His breakout year was 2012, when he publicly aired his own ideas through the launch of several fashion experiments. While spending months in London living with the Donda team at the Lanesborough Hotel and working on an ambitious music video for West called Cruel Summer, Abloh, Matthew Williams, Justin Saunders,

Florence Galarza, and Heron Preston would talk their way into London dance clubs and take over the turntables, promising the management that West would show up later.¹⁵ They playfully imagined themselves as a "boy band of DJs" and came up with the name Been Trill to brand their efforts, as well as nicknames for each of the members (fig. 6).¹⁶ Any self-respecting band needed merch, so hats and t-shirts were also made for the members, using a drippy, off-the-shelf horror-movie font that Abloh loved, but which West hated, as their signature motif (fig. 7).¹⁷ An early version of a Been Trill shirt with the words "MDM Eggz" played on the drug culture of the London dance scene and was the first of several iterations made in collaboration with the avant-garde New York fashion brand Hood By Air. The nascent label was wildly successful and went viral, stoked by appearances by celebrities such as West and ASAP Rocky wearing the shirts and hats. For Abloh, the scope of it was ultimately too limited, its intent from the beginning too jokey and insidery, and the group walked away from it.¹⁸

The association with Hood By Air and its cofounder Shayne Oliver was another important milestone for Abloh. HBA was borne of Lower Manhattan club culture-skater streetwear, and was distinctively queer, qualities that Abloh appreciated as urgently authentic to the time and place.¹⁹ He offered his graphic design services to Oliver, and even guest-designed two seasons of HBA in 2013–14 (figs 8, 9).²⁰ Some of the distinctive hallmarks of the clothes Abloh designed include liberal amounts of text and branding on the garments, layering, and a reliance on silhouettes and references from utilitarian clothing. ASAP Rocky walked down the runway to conclude the Fall/Winter 2013/14 presentation, further illuminating the circle of collaborators that was in formation at the time.²¹ This exact language would be developed further once Abloh launched Off-White, and the familial association with Oliver's brand and vision, both as friend and fan, is important to note.

At the end of the year, Abloh would truly go out on his own, putting to use in his first solo brand many of the lessons he had learned over the decade. Taking his Been Trill DJ name, Pyrex Vision, he came up with a simple formula of silkscreening "Pyrex" as well as the number 23 on preexisting shirts and shorts. In the first group, Champion t-shirts and gym shorts got the treatment, followed by deadstock Ralph Lauren flannel shirts. Itself a gesture of coded language borrowed from

Dear Alyssia,

You may or may not know the Moravian Gallery, organiser of the Brno Biennial, has no plans to host its next edition in 2020 (and possibly beyond). The Brno Biennial existed continuously since 1963 – and sure, things change, nothing is forever.

We* however thought that it would be a shame to let it end so quietly and decided we could create an alternative reality 29th Brno Biennial 2020. We spoke with IDEA magazine and they generously offered pages within their next issue alongside their report of the Fikra graphic design Biennial 01.

Our question is then: would you design a poster for the 29th International Biennial of Graphic Design Brno 2020? The brief is very open but its disappearance or the creation of an alternative space time continuum (think anything from quantum physics to Back to the Future) are one possible strand.

We cannot offer any monetary compensation and would understand the time pressure as the deadline to get the files to the magazine is the looming 20 May 2019. All we can say is that by creating the full page poster/images in IDEA we can possibly make it happen.

What do you say?

Thank you,

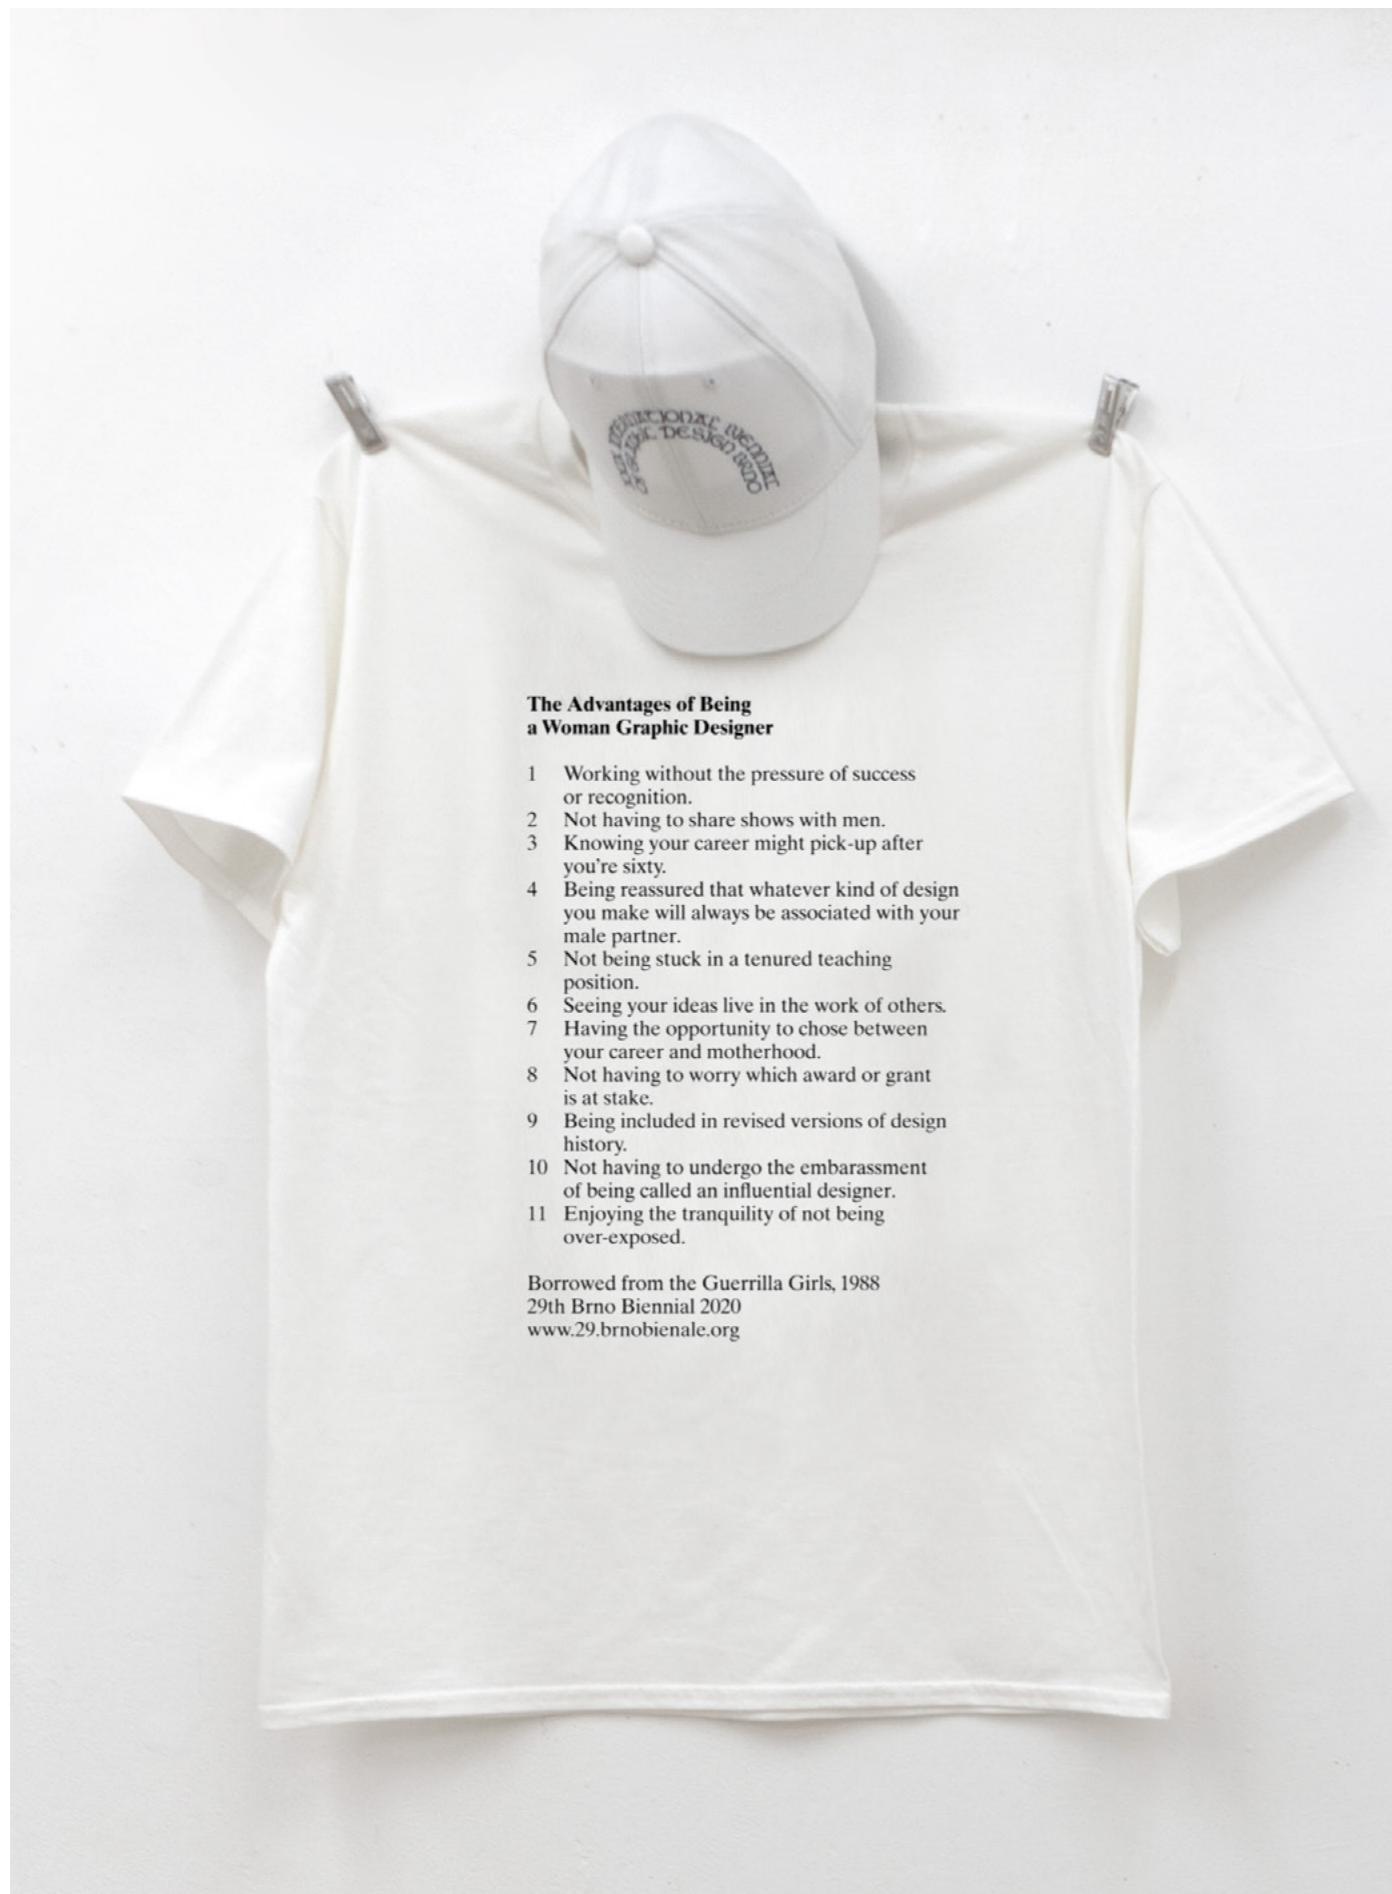

*Radim Pesko, Åbäke, Sofie Dederen and Madoka Nishi

Saïlene comes from silene acaulis, a flower under the form of a catchfly that rises where others cannot. Saïlene is a project commissioned by Valiance, a Swiss rubber strap maker specialised in watchmaking.

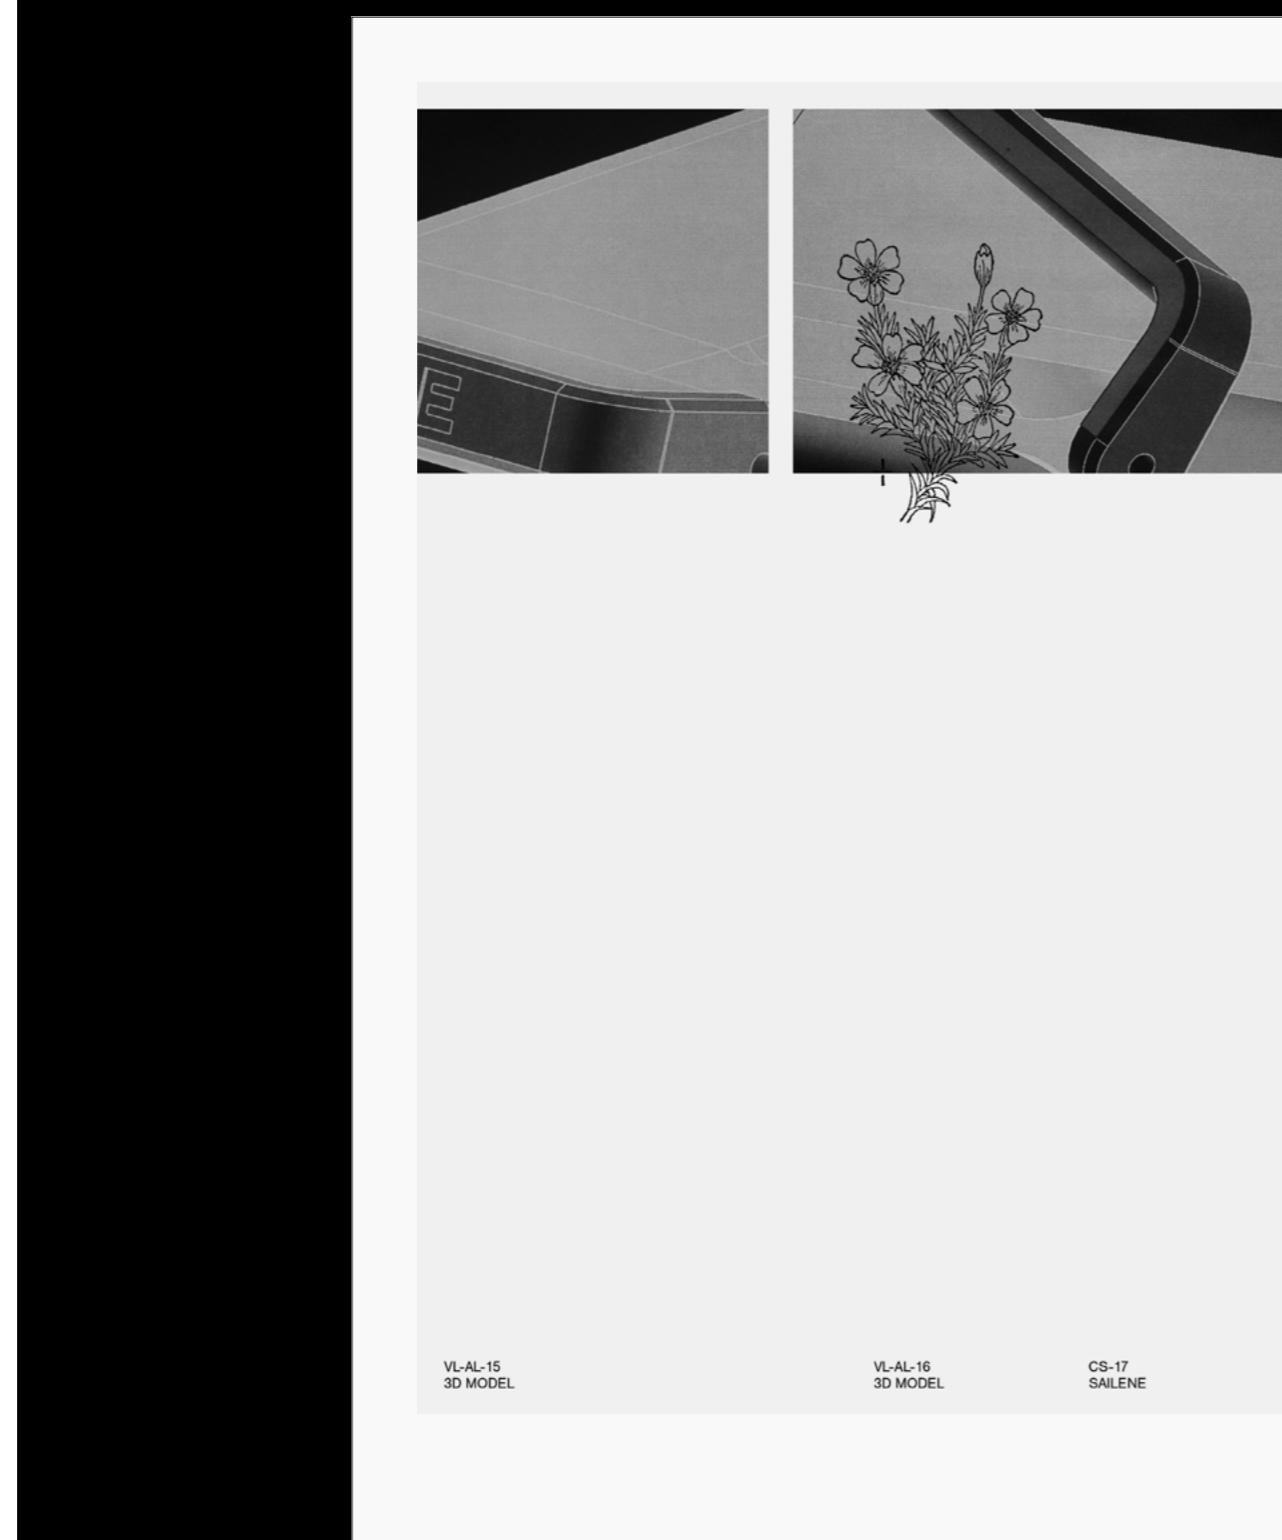

We were commissionned to design visuals for Saïlene, the story about watchmaking. Archive, research, prototypes and process materials were received and then processed in order to convey a sense of the brand history and identity.

Les Fleures du Japon

In the beginning of May 2020, the artist Johanna Tagada Hoffbeck was supposed to have her artwork Les Fleures du Japon screened in a Milanese gallery. Due to the Covid-19 pandemic, her show was cancelled.

Les Fleures du Japon is a video piece - a selection of hand-free shots in various locations of Japan, with the sound of her own previous exhibitions visitors' memories read out loud.

Johanna Tagada Hoffbeck originally commissionned me into designing a poster and digital campaign, aiming to allow anyone reproducing her artwork at home with the help of a series of instructions. This project naturally led to reconsider the digital era in which we live in and how to readapt ourselves given this situation. A website and e-vites were also designed for the occasion.

Daily Practice

The notion of daily practice represents the guiding theme of this book. Featuring hundred eleven individual artworks gathered around eight themes, it introduces the artistic practice of French-born artist Johanna Tagada. The publication present the versatile nature of the artist's work, which encompasses a broad range of techniques, materials, and media including figurative and non-figurative drawings and paintings, collage, textile work and sculpture.

We have historically seen image and object as separate entities. Nevertheless, it has become increasingly difficult to define the point where one ends and begins. Printed wood on laminates for flooring or furniture have become more and more hyperreal and verging on the psychedelic. A strange mix of deception and decoration. These objects encourage a dialogue between craft, image, industrial and the digital, and different techniques were used to transport image onto different materials, such as wood, aluminium and foam.

Produced seasonally, an important part of the identity of Patcharavipa is the series of ‘Compendiums’. Each compendium is a specially commissioned object designed using a variety of devices, materials and techniques. Together they clarify and frame the themes and collection of each season.

The Spring/Summer 2020 Patcharavipa campaign is called ‘Clues’. Photographed by Daniel Shea, the scene is set in a gallery space, the imagery is two scenes suggesting that more than one scene happening. One in reality, the other one is fantasy.

Transcribed by the use of black and white, the fantasy is depicted as experimental, expressive, performative space - whereas the reality is coloured objective and careful, establishing place and characters.

Veinte Años de Despacio
Twenty Years of Despacio

This publication marks the beginning, the end, and the future one of the most significant art spaces in Central America: Despacio. Founded in San José, Costa Rica in 2008, Despacio began with occasional solo exhibitions of local, national, and international artists, and grew into a visionary and highly unconventional art space devoted to art, politics, and ecology by means of public programs, open studio visits, field trips, residencies, and a highly experimental exhibition program focused on pathbreaking artists from Central America. Instead of following the standardised North American and Western European art market,

This book covers Despacio's journey since 2008 and proposes the continuation of Despacio's ethos and attitude far into the future, to 2028 and beyond. The publication includes contributions from some of Latin America's most forward-thinking curators, Fernanda Brenner, Jens Hoffmann and Sandino Scheidegger; an interview with artist Federico Herrero by Natalia Valencia Arango; an interview with Pablo León de la Barra by Cristina Ramírez and Erno Hilario; a newly commissioned photo essay by San José-based artist Pablo Cambronero.
